

The Falls of the Bounding Deer.

(From the International Magazine.)

BY ALFRED B. STREET.

Continued.

The Count now rejoined the party, after having peered most anxiously and at various points into the lower basin to find the drowned one, all clustered together upon the short velvet sward near the streamlet, and Paddock was called upon for one of his Indian legends.

He said he knew one relating to this very spot, and accordingly commenced:

"In the old times, before the foot of the white man had startled the beaver from the stream, or his axe sent the eagle screaming with rage from his aerie on the lofty pine tree, there dwelt a tribe by these waters, an offshoot of the powerful Mohawks. They were called the tribe of the Deer, and had for their chieftain, 'Oo-ko-ne-an-tah,' meaning also the Deer. He had one daughter, beautiful as the day, who was named 'Jo-que-yoh' or the Bluebird, for the melody of her voice. Jo-que-yoh was affianced to a young brave of her father's tribe named 'To-ke-ah,' or the Oak. They were tenderly attached to each other. Often when the moon of the summer night transformed these rugged rocks to pearl and this headlong torrent to plunging silver, did the two seat themselves by the margin of this very basin, and while Jo-que-yoh touched with simple skill the strings of her Indian lute, To-ke-ah sang of love and the sweet charms of his mistress. In the war-path the young brave thought only of her, and the scalp he took were displayed to her sight in token of his prowess. In the chase, he still thought of her solely, and the gray coat of the deer and the bridled skin of the fierce panther were laid at her feet. The vest of the glossy beaver which encompassed her lovely form was the spoil of his arrow. And the eagle plume which rose gracefully from her brow was plucked by his hand from the wing of the haughty soarer of the clouds, that his unerring arrow had brought down the dusky Time. Based on the crescent of Jo-que-yoh's hair, Time was plunging into the full light of maiden grace, and the tall sapling of To-ke-ah's strength maturing into the size and vigor of his manhood's oak. Another noon and he was to lead Jo-que-yoh as his bride to his lodge. The happy day at length arrived, and as soon as the first star trembled in the heavens, the joyous ceremony was to take place. Sunset came, steeping the scene around in lustrous gold and Jo-que-yoh, arrayed by the maidens of her tribe, sat in the lodge of her father awaiting the star that was to bring her love to her presence. Blushing and trembling she saw 'Kah-qual' (the Indian name for the sun) wheeling down into the crimson west, and now his light was hidden. Blushing and trembling, she saw the sweet twilight stealing over the endless forests, and now the star—the bright star of her hope, came creeping like a timid fawn, into the purple heavens. She heard a footstep, she turned—'To-ke-ah,' trembled on her lips. But it was not To-ke-ah. It was Oo-ko-ne-an-tah, her father decked in all his finest splendor, to give away the bride. To-ke-ah she knew had departed in the afternoon upon a neighboring trail for a brighter eagle plume to adorn the brow of his lovely bride on this evening of her bridal. Something had detained him but he will come soon. She fixed her large dark eye-like eye upon the star.

Momentarily it brightened and again another footstep. It was the maiden she had dispatched upon the rocks to watch for her the approaching form of To-ke-ah. Large and brighter grew the star, but still the absent came not. A shuddering fear began to creep into her bosom. Nothing could detain the absent from her but one reason—death! Larger and brighter grew the star until now it flashed like the eye of To-ke-ah from its home in the heavens. Still the absent came not. Tears began to flow, and she at length started in wild fear from her couch of sassafras to the towering rock to see if she could not behold the approaching shape of To-ke-ah. By this time the sky was sparkling with stars, and a feeble light was shed upon the forests. She saw the pointed rocks around her—she saw the two leaps of the torrent through their rugged pathway—she saw the still black basins on which the stars were glittering, but To-ke-ah. 'To-ke-ah! To-ke-ah! Jo-que-yoh awaits thee!' she cried, but she heard only the plunging of the torrents, and the song of the whippoorwill wailing as if in echo to her woe. Trembling seized her limbs, her heart grew sick, and she was high swooning upon the rock, when she saw a form hurrying from the woods where the trail began. 'To-ke-ah!' she shrieked joyfully, 'I have been sad without thee!' and she was about casting herself into the arms of the form, when she found it was the youth who had accompanied To-ke-ah in the chase.

"Is not the brave here?" asked the youth, with astonishment; "I left him at the first leap of the torrent, searching for the eagle nest that is in the cleft of the rock!"

With a wild scream Jo-que-yoh rushed away again to her wigwam; with a wild scream she asked for To-ke-ah, and no answer being returned, she darted to her canoe fastened in the cave above the upper leap.

"I go for To-ke-ah!" she screamed, as she seized the paddle and unfasted the willow withe, and the canoe darted into the stream directly towards the bend of the torrent. The starlight displayed her slender form to the agonized sight of her father, plunging down the foaming cataract, and she was seen no more! The canoe overturned, emerged into the basin and dashed down the curve of the second plunge. The father followed by those present, rushed down the precipice to the basin below, and there were the fragments of the canoe floating around in the eddying waters. A light shape was also seen in the dark pool, and leaping in, Oo-ko-ne-an-tah dragged to the margin the drooping form of his daughter. She was dead! A stream of blood poured from her fractured temple, and the father held in his arms only the remains of the loved and still lovely Jo-que-yoh. But a warrior canoe came rushing down the rocks with 'Jo-que-yoh!' loud upon its tongue. It was To-ke-ah. He had wandered for
